

People pay for xm radio, so let them broadcast whatever they want. i mean the whole logic of "it might change the way that radio does business and hurt some big players" just doesn't wash. When Thomas Edison first invented the light bulb, the candle makers union was up in arms to ban the new technology because it would hurt their business. Well tuff, learn how to make light bulbs is what I say. I thought the FCC was supposed to be serving the public interest, not in bed with big business: your organization seems to be meddling in a lot of places these days, places you have absolutely no business to be.
